CONTEXT

The refugee population is mainly composed of people from Colombia, Cuba, El Salvador, Nicaragua, and Venezuela. As a result of the COVID-19 pandemic, refugees and asylum-seekers in Panama continue to face exacerbated risks and increased vulnerabilities, mainly due to the loss of opportunities to generate an income. Consequently, daily subsistence and rent has become a challenge.

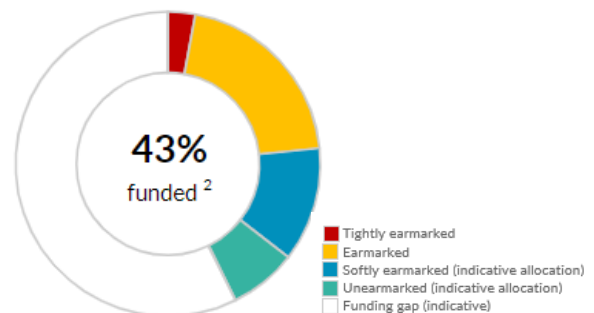

Movements of people entering through Darien (southern border with Colombia) increased considerably, with only small numbers requesting international protection in Panama, whilst the overall majority continues in transit northward. So far in 2021, a new record number of 121,737 persons¹ have entered irregularly through the Darien gap, including 26,650 children. In October alone, the highest inflow was recorded for the year at 29,604 persons. Protection risks and humanitarian needs have increased in Darien, particularly for children and women within mixed movements.
